

Six ways ARDA can shed light on schools' religious contexts

BY ANDREW L. WHITEHEAD AND DEBORAH H. C. GIN

The world is rapidly changing, and so is the landscape of theological education. How can schools and their respective constituencies make informed and confident decisions in the midst of such change? Where can they turn to ask thoughtful questions about their religious contexts as well as to resource their students as they engage ministry?

The Association of Theological Schools is collaborating with the Association of Religion Data Archives (ARDA) to increase access to the information and tools that schools need to make decisions and respond to their respective religious contexts. The ARDA is committed to helping schools, educators, students, and religious leaders ask tough questions about their congregations, communities, countries, and world. They are devoted to providing free access to trustworthy data and resources that will allow them to answer their questions easily and accurately.

The ARDA currently offers many free online and interactive resources that can stimulate important conversations. Here are brief descriptions of the six most popular tools:

1. The Community Profile Builder and Guides

The Community Profile Builder assists users in accessing free online information about their communities.

The initial map shows the locations of other congregations in a chosen area using any zip code, city and state, or complete address in the United States. The Profile Builder then provides social, economic, and religious information about the selected community or neighborhood.

These data are drawn from several sources including the US Census and the Religious Congregations and Membership Study. <http://thearda.com/demographicMap/>.

This free online resource has been used by congregational leaders and pastors to gain a data-driven sense of a given congregation's context. These insights have helped many know how best to serve their communities, as well as what types of ministries their congregations might consider starting. For instance, you could answer questions like "Are there a lot of families with young children around my congregation or primarily older adults?" or

“Are there areas near my congregation where the poverty rate is high?”

The ARDA also offers eight free Community Profile Builder Guides that assist users with more detailed directions and thoughts on how to interpret and best use the Community Profile. Prior users share how the Community Profile Builder helped them better understand the needs of their neighbors, figure out where to start a new ministry, and decide how their faith communities could best reach out to their physical communities.

2. Congregational Resource Center

The Congregational Resource Center on the ARDA is a one-stop shop for resources useful to congregations. The Congregational Resource Center includes a “Did You Know” section that highlights common questions congregational leaders ask and where answers to these questions can be found on the ARDA. These include broad questions like “What do Americans believe and how do they behave?,” “How does my congregation/religious tradition compare to others?,” and “Where can I find data on religion around the world?” with subquestions included under each.

The Congregational Resource Center also contains various helpful guides for congregations. These free resources allow priests, pastors, or lay leaders to discover the frameworks of their communities or create a pin map of where all their congregants live.

3. QuickStats

Users can browse and see responses from major national surveys on dozens of topics using the QuickStats resource page. If students need to cite statistics on how often Americans attend religious services or how many people belong to a certain religious tradition, they can find the answers here. For each topic, users can also explore differences across various demographic groups or changes over time. <http://www.thearda.com/quickstats/>

4. QuickLists

QuickLists provides the best available data on American and international religion in rank order. Clicking on any of the available links expands options significantly. Users can explore the percent adherence rate of every US county, metro area, or state for hundreds of religious groups and search by broader religious tradition or by religious families.

QuickLists also allows users to compare nations, regions of the world, and world religions, including which nations rank highest on the “Human Development Index” or “Restriction of Economic Freedom.” The tool also provides information on which countries have the highest proportion of agnostics, atheists, Christians, or Muslims, among many others, including the rank order of largest world religions. Any group interested in serving overseas could use QuickLists as a great place to begin to understand the context of where they are traveling.

5. Compare Members

The Compare Members tool allows users to compare the members of 26 different religious groups in the United States. This resource uses data from the extremely large 2014 US Religious Landscape Survey collected by the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life. Users can choose up to five different religious groups at one time and run the comparison. The comparison data include demographics, moral attitudes, political attitudes, religious beliefs, and religious practices.

6. American Religion Timelines

The ARDA provides nine separate American religion timelines that allow users to explore the most significant people, places, and events in the history of religion in the United States. The “Prominent Religious Events and People” section provides a thorough overview from the 1600s until today. There are also timelines focused on Baptist, Catholic, Methodist, and Presbyterian events and people. Timelines are also provided for “Social Movements and Religion,” “Religious Minorities (Non-Christians),” “Race/Ethnicity and Religion,” and “Women and Religion.” Each entry contains a description, links to additional timelines, photographs, and sources for further reading. <http://www.thearda.com/timeline/>

The ARDA is so much more than a data archive (although the archive contains more than 1,000 data files!). Users of these resources consistently provide positive feedback about the tools. Take a moment to explore and interact with all of the free online content the ARDA provides—we trust it will ignite your and your students’ interests and become a trusted resource to return to in the future.
